AIREY HOUSES

The design was developed by Leeds based builder Sir Edwin Airey and designed by Frederick Gibberd in the aftermath of the Second World War, built on Airey's earlier experience with concrete housing. A total of 26,000 Airey houses were built in the period 1945-55. The Airey house design is a 'kit of parts' that can be used to build a variety of house sizes and layouts. The most common type of Airey house has a fairly large dwelling layout intended originally for farm labourers' cottages, designed as 'Rural' which may be North or South facing.

Airey house structures consist of precast concrete (PRC) storey height columns clad with concrete panels in a ship-lap arrangement. They are deemed to be of a non standard construction which makes the sourcing of mortgages difficult unless they have had remedial works and have a PRC Certificate.
