Description

"You had me at hello..." And truly, Bleak House does.

Dickensian only in name, there is absolutely nothing bleak about Bleak House. It is a house with soul, history and quiet grandeur. A home that sits entirely at ease within it's landscape.

A Victorian residence; it's character and personality are etched into every beautifully finished corner. The accommodation is both generous and deeply inviting: five wonderful bedrooms, alongside a guest suite that offers privacy and comfort for family and friends. There is living space galore but never at the expense of intimacy. Every room feels lived in, loved and layered with history.

And what a history, DH Lawrence himself is said to have stayed here whilst visiting his English professor, for whom this remarkable house was once home. Some rooms retain their original oak-panelled shutters, rising elegantly from their hidden wooden housings like little pieces of theatre from another age. Everywhere, there are reminders of craftsmanship and care.

At the centre of family life lies the kitchen, once the dairy, now transformed into a warm and welcoming gathering space. French doors open directly onto the garden, blurring the line between indoors and out, inviting children, dogs, muddy boots and laughter inside after afternoons beyond the house.

And then there are the grounds. Fabulous gardens unfold into a magnificent 2.7 acre paddock with stables and outbuildings. Whether you're an equestrian family, seeking land, or simply longing for room to breathe, Bleak House answers beautifully. There is even a separate driveway to the paddock, allowing the equestrian facilities to function independently. At the bottom of the paddock lies a pond fed by the local beck, so clear that watercress grows here naturally. It's the kind of detail that belongs in a novel rather than a property brochure.

Are you looking for a home with more than just square footage? If so Bleak House won't just welcome you, it will steal your heart.
